Conclusions

Professor Dr. Beate Rudolf, Freie Universität Berlin, Faculty of Law and SFB 700

In the past years, the role and status of non-state actors has become the object of increased research from various perspectives of public international law. The Project “Public International Law Standards for Governance in Weak and Failing States” has focused its attention on non-state actors that fulfill governance functions in areas of limited statehood, such as security, law-making and law-enforcement, or welfare. In its analysis of whether non-state actors are bound by public international law, the project intersects with many of the other approaches put forward by international legal scholars. The event brings together some of these perspectives, as evidenced in the debates within the “Non-State Actors” Committee of the International Law Association (ILA), and it adds the perspective of scholars from Armenia and Georgia who build on their experiences from states in transition facing various challenges of governance.

Workshop and conference aim at disentangling problems surrounding the status of non-state actors under public international law by differentiating between the various kinds of actors and by distinguishing between the governance function they fulfill. From the perspective of governance within areas of limited statehood, the most relevant actors are parties to armed conflicts, de facto regimes, groups of individuals claiming or having gained autonomy, as well as transnational corporations, including private security companies. Each of these actors poses specific problems as to whether they can - and should be - duty-bearers under public international law. Each of them challenges a state-centered conception of public international law in a different way. Nuanced answers are called for, but they will also reveal commonalities. The look at non-state actors from the perspective of the governance function they fulfill (or claim to fulfill) permits identifying overarching duties under public international law. In turn, it raises the question of how such duties can be imposed on different non-state actors and whether it is legitimate to do so.

Based on these considerations, the conference will address the question of whether public international law as it stands is a valid and legitimate normative standard for governance provided by non-state actors. In other words: Can present-day public international law cope with new modes of governance involving non-state actors or is the state-centered model outdated? If so, what new model could – or even should – take its place?
